guienlaura Juan José Cabezudo (c. 1830–1860) never had a neutral portrait
An Afro-Peruvian cook in early republican Lima, Cabezudo is widely considered Peru's first openly queer public figure: "hyper-visible but marginalized, mocked yet socially embedded" (Making Queer History).

For a man at the margins of race, class and sexuality, he left an unusually rich trace in the Arts of its time. But each of these traces carry the bias of its maker. Pierre paints him with paler skin. Courret stages him as a picturesque "tipo peruano" for collectors.

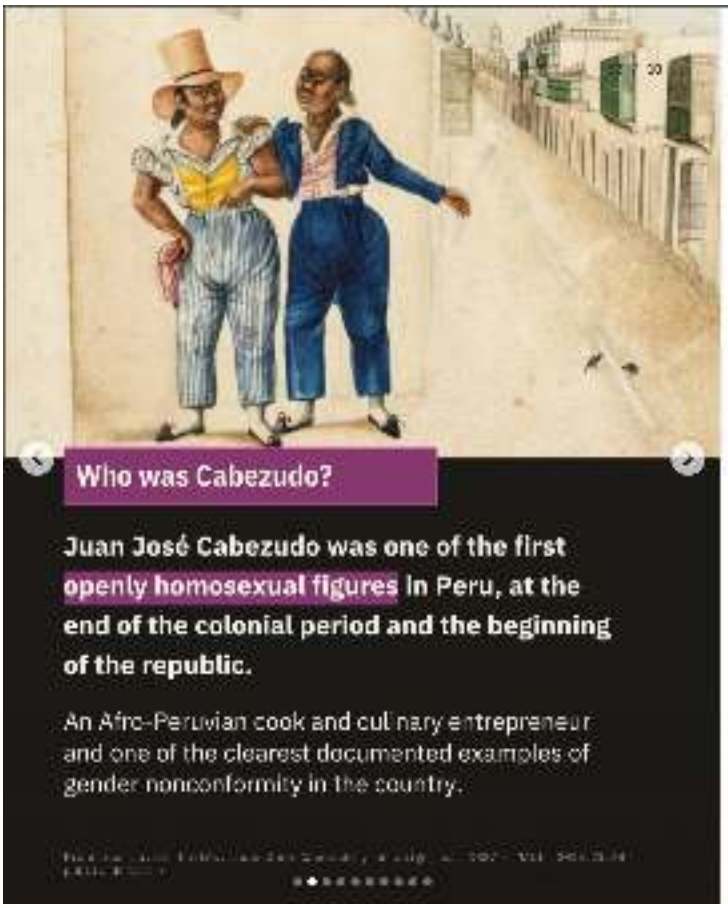

Today, what happens when you ask a chatbot about Cabezudo?

On 21 September 2026 we put six neutral questions about Cabezudo's life and legacy to six AI models (Claude Sonnet 5, GPT-5.5, Gemini 3.5 Flash, GLM-5.3, Mistral Large, Grok 4.6),

Who is Juan José Cabezudo?

Today, anyone can ask a chatbot about the past.

Would a chatbot still remember that Cabezudo was queer?

Or would that part quietly disappear?

6 questions 6 chatbots 3 times each

We put the same 6 neutral questions to 6 chatbots, three times each.

The chatbots returned very different versions of Cabezudo.

His queerness was

sometimes central,

sometimes a passing detail,

once dropped entirely.

Like the paintings and photographs before them, chatbots still reshape Cabezudo's image.

But those left an author, a date, a caption.

Chatbots answer with no author and no date, and give back many versions.

A memory that shifts.

Memories like Cabezudo's change shape easily: Black, queer, and especially exposed to bias

Before you let an AI tell you a story like his:

01 compare versions,

02 look for the source,

03 go back to the people who kept the memory alive.
